Work on delivery of intro without using notes; especially when it's something not particularly difficult. Reciting the US Marine's hymn is not something I would say is overly difficult to remember.

Make sure you don't rehash arguments. Rehash means mentioning the same argument someone else already presented. If you find yourself needing to use a phrase like "Representative _____ already mentioned this, butâ€¦." or something similar to that, odds are it is rehash and you probably shouldn't say it. Instead, there's a few things you could do. Replace the argument with clash (refuting other arguments from earlier speakers), or you could have extra contentions that you prepare throughout the week in case someone takes the one you wanted to present. Another option would be not speaking on the topic and giving one of the first speeches on whatever topic is next.
--> To be fair, you did a great job convincing the chamber to let you give a speech when it wasn't your turn. This on top of PO'ing is probably going to set you high up.

Make sure you're causing clash. Clash is the refutation of other speakers' arguments. Unless you are delivering the first affirmative speech, you should always be doing this. The later in the debate that you speak, the more clash we should hear. To effectively cause clash, you have to do three things. First, tell me the name of a representative who spoke. Second, tell me what their argument was briefly. Finally, tell me what your response to that argument is. Why is your point stronger? Why is their point incorrect? When we don't do things like this, it diminishes the "debate" aspect of this activity.
--> The later you speak (~50min here of debate already heard) the more clash I should hear. In your case, I didn't hear any.
--> One very minor clash point after I wrote that.

Fun full-circle ending.

Be a little more efficient with your procedure. It took kind of a long time, and there were things we did not need.
-->Not really a scoring issue, just something to consider.

Good job standing/sitting at the appropriate and correct times.

During questioning, work on pointing your gavel at the next questioner. It lets the questioner know to be ready.
--> You did better with this after I wrote it. Well done.

Work on calling questions a little faster
--> not a big deal given the chambers are massive today.

When voting on legislation -- Try to be a little quicker. It's not something I care to be 100% perfect... like if you miscount by 1 or 2, at least as far as I'm concerned, it's not a big deal.

The eye contact is not really happening the way it should, you spend a lot of time looking at your notes. Work to get off book, it will improve your score. I'm giving you a 5 but it really should be lower based on that issue. Connect with your audience.

Opening creates a clear path for the argument to follow. Logic follows and key points are supported by evidence. The argument wisely (as the final argument to be heard) elects to spend its time rebutting the opposition as to allow those criticism to be the final words hanging in the air.

Delivery of information is not only confident but includes masterful use of vocal inflection.

Responses to questions are stiff, effective, and directly on point to the discussion.

Great inflection and appeal to pathos. You tend to mumble / get quieter towards the end of your sentences which can make it either hard to understand your point or take away from the magnitude of your impacts. Your second contention is weaker than your first. You need to further elaborate on what ability means. By my understanding, you are saying that if someone sucks at basketball, they shouldnt be able to play it. People can get better at sports with practice in school sports. Additionally, participation does not mean inclusion on Division 1 teams. It just means inclusion on a sports team. So someone who sucks could be put on their novice team or division 3. Confused on the point your trying to make, and I think fellow representatives are as well. I think you can forgo this contention and replace it with something better. Good reponses to questions.

I think it is very difficult to prove that it is being solved in the status quo. Rather than solved, I would say that there is already laws and legislation in place providing these provisions. Proving that this legislation is pointless, not necessarily that it is solved. Especially when there are multiple pieces of evidence saying otherwise that have been brought up previously. I think you need to address these ahead of time in your speech. When you use statistics make sure that you are elaborating and show the magnitude of those statistics.

Try not to read your intro. Your intro is the most important part of your speech because it determines whether the audience is going to listen to you or not. When we hear 12-15 speeches on the same topic, it gets very boring after awhile, and the judges and rest of the chamber are looking for a reason that your speech stands out. If you deliver your intro from memory, it grasps everyone's attention much better than reading from a paper.

Don't be afraid to get more creative in your intro rather than just jumping right into the substance of your arguments. Tell a brief story, start with a quote, etc. The idea is to try to be more memorable than the other speakers. Giving more of an introduction will help with that.

Try using some of the legislation in your speech; you make good general arguments, but it would be much stronger if you tied them directly to a provision in the legislation and tell us why your argument is specifically important.

Too much reading from your manuscript throughout. Try to be a little more extemporaneous/delivery with much more eye contact. Your arguments are good, but that's only half of the battle. You have to also present the arguments well.

Outstanding amount of research, evidence, etc. -- arguments are very well thought-out, explained with good analysis.

Make sure you're causing clash. Clash is the refutation of other speakers' arguments. Unless you are delivering the first affirmative speech, you should always be doing this. The later in the debate that you speak, the more clash we should hear. To effectively cause clash, you have to do three things. First, tell me the name of a representative who spoke.
